1. Mr. Dulles' Nomination as Director of Central Intelligence

Mr. Dulles, referring to the President's announcement that he, Mr. Dulles, had been nominated as Director of Central Intelligence, stated that, depending upon Senate confirmation, he would assume office on or about 1 February 1953.

Mr. Dulles expressed his deep sense of responsibility for the new job. It is a position, he explained, that held for him the greatest possible interest and entailed, therefore, no sacrifice on his part. He pointed out that General Smith had "put us on the right track" and that he intended to follow the General's lead.

2. General Cabell's Appointment as Deputy Director

Mr. Dulles remarked on CIA's good fortune in obtaining the services of General Cabell as Deputy Director, stating that he had the highest regard and respect for General Cabell. He pointed out that, while CIA is a civilian organization, it is necessary to maintain a proper balance between civilians and the military. Until General Cabell is able to take over full time, he will be available for conferences, briefings, etc., on Tuesdays and Thursdays.

3. Future Assistant Directors' Meetings

In closing, Mr. Dulles asked the Assistant Directors to consider, during the next two weeks, whether the AD Meetings are worth while and whether they should be continued.
